ARGUMENT.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in Maelor Castle.

The Castle of Maelor has for some time been the scene of great activity and unusual preparations. It is the eve of the marriage of Ellen of Maelor Castle, to Arthur of Berwyn Castle. Lady Maelor (Ellen's mother) is intently viewing the numerous bridal presents which have been bestowed upon her happy child. The arrival of Sir Howell Ddu and his fair adopted Blodwen at the castle is impatiently awaited. Suddenly the Messenger announces their arrival; and the servants, in the distance, are heard manifesting their regards for Arthur and Ellen. Iolo, the Bard, then enters the apartment, and Arthur and his affianced receive his congratulations.

SCENE II.—Maelor Castle—The Marriage Festivities.

The nuptials of Arthur and Ellen have been consummated. In the festive hall, where happiness and gaiety reign supreme, they are surrounded by devoted friends. The sun of evening, fast approaching the horizon, pours in its golden flood upon the gay assemblage, whose mirth has already attained its climax, when a number of Plantagenet soldiers present themselves and demand the keys of the castle. Little heed, however, is paid to the requests of Henry's henchmen, who are ordered off at once.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—In front of Maelor Castle—The Chase.

On the castle lawn, in the grey of morn, the hunters are preparing for the chase, and gaily singing their hunting choruses. Iolo enters, and from the appearance of the heavens prophesies that troubles are impending. Sir Howell Ddu, who does not join the hunters, in a subdued tone sings a ditty to his Blodwen. From an adjacent arbour, Blodwen overhears the sentiments of love expressed by Sir Howell, and a scene of mutual declaration of affection ensues. The Huntsmen, on their return home, are heard singing in the distance: a Messenger appears on the scene. Verifying the prediction of Iolo, he declares that King Henry's legions are marching on the fatherland, and concludes by uttering, in the name of the Prince, a call to arms in defence of home and country.

SCENE II.—In Maelor Castle.

Sir Howell and Arthur cheer one another in a duet of martial music, followed by a chorus of Welsh soldiery. The eve of their departure to the field of battle is rendered pathetic by the introduction of an air expressive of Ellen's grief at parting with her husband. Blodwen, who is also overwhelmed with sorrow, following the example set by Ellen, fastens a favour upon the breast of her betrothed, and repeats the air already sung by Ellen. A chorus sung by the Welsh soldiers brings this scene to a close.

SCENE III.—Apartment in Maelor Castle.

Lady Maelor's Messenger, from the field of battle, arrives with news of the sanguinary conflict. Although Arthur and Sir Howell have distinguished themselves by their dauntless bravery, the Bard predicts that there are but faint hopes that victory will crown their efforts. A further elaboration of this episode brings us in a desponding mood to the end of the second act.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Maelor Castle—Death of Arthur.

Arthur, mortally wounded in battle, has been conveyed back to the castle, where he lies under the tender care of his youthful spouse. Calm and serene in the midst of his agony, he breathes the air he sang to his devoted Ellen when he departed for the fray; and while the last words of the song are yet on his lips he draws his expiring breath. Following this incident we have a solemn funeral chorus.

SCENE II.—Lady Maelor's Room.

Lady Maelor's Messenger, coming from the battle-field, states that the Welsh have been defeated and are retreating towards Snowdon. Blodwen, anxious for the fate of Sir Howell, in a song invokes the passing breeze to carry her some tidings of her absent lover. The mingled anxiety and sense of abject loneliness on the part of Blodwen develop into intense anguish when she is informed by Iolo that the Welsh have been vanquished, and that Sir Howell Ddu has been made prisoner.

SCENE III.—Chester Gaol—The Condemned Knight.

Opens with a Prisoners' chorus. Blodwen, Lady Maelor, and Iolo have had permission to interview, for the last time, the unhappy knight in his condemned cell. Sir Howell, singing his farewell song to Blodwen, returns to her the favour, once of pearly whiteness, but now discoloured by the gore of the fallen. While the knight imprints the last kiss upon the lips of his betrothed, the enemy from without sing a jubilant chorus, and the quartet from within sing in intense agony, and suddenly is heard a violent knocking at the ponderous prison doors. On being admitted, the stranger demands to be shown to Sir Howell's cell. Iolo, meanwhile, seeks to know the stranger's name, who, to the astonishment of all, is found to be no other than Rhys Gwyn (Blodwen's father), who was supposed to have been slain twenty years previous to this. A scene of inexpressible pathos follows this discovery—Blodwen rushes into her father's arms, and he in turn embraces her with paternal affection; Iolo and Lady Maelor are dumb with astonishment; and poor Sir Howell watches the scene with a palpitating and melancholy heart. It is on! when the first blush of excitement has somewhat abated, that Rhys Gwyn has time to communicate the joyous tidings of which he is the bearer. The King is dead, and to mark the mournful day, it has been decreed that all prisoners shall receive free pardon! The prisoners are liberated—the prison doors are thrown wide open—the excited multitude rush in with shouts of joy; and the Opera terminates with a fugal chorus, into which the strains of a popular Welsh march have been introduced.
